Once an upscale public bath frequented by fin de siècle Parisian intellectuals — Marcel Proust is said to have taken his coffee here — Les Bains Paris is most remembered as a hotspot for Parisian nightlife during the 1980s and 1990s.

Then known as Les Bains Douches, the success of a club where designers would dance after their shows with David Bowie and Prince is not easily revived. But after a lengthy renovation that added a restaurant and five-star hotel last year, Les Bains has reclaimed its position as a gathering spot for the fashion makers of the French capital.

You might spot the gang behind the largely anonymous design collective Vêtements — if you know who to look for — at the restaurant's bar or the shoe designer Pierre Hardy.

The open layout of the bar-restaurant lends itself more to "see and be seen" than a discreet tête-à-tête. But with a DJ mixing contemporary electro with nostalgic pop on weekend evenings, the privacy of your conversations is assured, at least.

Customers nostalgic for the disco era or a bit of 1990s glamour can nip down to the lovingly preserved basement club after dinner, where some have been known to get carried away — swimming in their undergarments in the Paris club's legendary plunge pool.

During lunch hours, the gastronomic bistro menu designed by the Tour d'Argent's Philippe Labbé tops out at only €20 for the main course, making Les Bains' latest iteration a great daytime meeting spot as well — at a price that appeals to more than just the fashion set.
